Unfortunately, as popular as video monitors are, there's a price to be paid in terms of additional heat and power consumption. While this is rarely an issue for computers that don't place a premium on power savings, it's something that's worth keeping in mind when shopping for a monitor. If your average PC build uses a graphics card that offers above average power efficiency, it's safe to assume that you'll be able to get away with a lower-end or even an entry-level display that draws under half the power of those that are built on less efficient, higher-end cards. Even if you don't build your own rigs, there's still the most important question: Which display should you buy? Here we look at the performance of various displays, from the low-powered entry-level models to the high-powered, high-priced ones. If you're an avid PC gamer you should pay attention to gaming laptops because they offer unmatched speed, great graphics, long battery life, super-responsive keys, and a strong gaming experience. When looking for a gaming laptop you should know the specs first before you buy. You need to know what kind of CPU and GPU you want and whether you need a laptop or a tablet. Which ones should you buy? Here's a list. The Best Gaming Laptop All-New Razer Blade Pro Razer Blade Pro Review The all-new Razer Blade Pro laptop is a thin, light, and powerful laptop with great battery life and a powerful GTX 980 GPU that is fully customizable.
